The city of Ivanovo, located on the “Golden Ring” of Russia and known as the country’s textile capital, attracts tourists not only with its ancient cathedrals, ramparts and shopping arcades, but also with its textile mill buildings that stand on the shores of the rivers Uvod and Talka. The center of the city boasts true architectural treasures of the period of constructionism built there in the 1920s – early 1930s. For historical reasons, Ivanovo-Voznesensk became the site of unique construction experiments carried out by both architects from Moscow and St. Petersburg, followers of the utilitarian architectural movement, and local architects. Their projects were aimed at creating an infrastructure of an ideal soviet city. As many as fifty structures built in the constructionism style during that “golden age” have been preserved in Ivanovo.
